Excerpt: .means you no harm, she said; you know he means you no harm. I don t want to have you threatened on my account; but you once had little children yourself--boys like mine. Tell me, for God s sake, if you know anything. Suppose your child had been taken from you without warning, without preparation. Oh! have pity, have pity! and tell me if you know where is my boy. Mrs. Stanfield roused herself at this appeal. I told you always as pride would have a fall, she said. It s you to come and ask me for your boy--you as never asked me to go inside of your door when all was well. What have I got to do with your boy? My Tom s gone off to sea--not to be a burden to nobody. Them as grudged him a bit of dinner, and them as was too high to speak to him when they met him, they ve got their will. I wouldn t have a son o mine stay here to be put upon, that s all as I know. I ll tell you o my boy, but I ain t got nothing to tell you of yours. If it s my advice as you want, Agnes Stanfield, she continued, with a flash of triumph out of her fiery eyes, my opinion is to drag the pond, and not to lose no time. If you d not druv my Tom back...
